IMPACT AND FUTURE BENEFITS OF DR. SHABANA'S RESEARCH

Dr. Shabana's research is focused on solving real agricultural problems particularly in the tropical and subtropical regions. A major part of his research has been concentrating on biological control of weeds, parasitic plants, and plant diseases of global importance.

Dr. Shabana's research has influenced the field of biological control, especially his work on waterhyacinth. It was the basis for initiating the International Mycoherbicide Program for Eichhornia crassipes Control in Africa (IMPECCA), involving four International agencies [CABI Bioscience (UK Centre), UK; CABI Bioscience, Africa Regional Centre (ARC), Kenya, International Institute of Tropical Agriculture (IITA), Benin, West Africa; and Danish International Development Assistance (DANIDA), Denmark] in addition to four research institutions [Mansoura University, Egypt; Plant Protection Research Institute (PPRI), South Africa, Department of Research and Specialist Services (DRSS), Zimbabwe; and Danish Institute of Agricultural Sciences (DIAS), Denmark].

Dr. Shabana's research on the fungal biocontrol agent Phomopsis sp. formed the foundation for further work in Dr. Charudattan's laboratory, University of Florida that resulted in two U.S. patents. This fungal pathogen is now being considered as a potential key to the control of glyphosate-resistant Palmer amaranth, a herbicide-resistant weed in cotton in the southern United States.

Dr. Shabana's research at the University of Hohenheim, Germany has had general involvements for the management of parasitic weeds that cause severe problems and outbreak in Sub-Saharan African agriculture and Eastern Europe.

Dr. Shabana's research at Purdue University on the development of the fungal biocontrol agent, Microsphaeropsis amaranthi as a bioherbicide for the control of waterhemp, a serious weed in U.S. Midwestern cropping systems, led to a novel technique of cost-effectively mass-producing high quality (more virulent) fungal spores, which can be useful for other fungi too. The efficacy of this biocontrol agent was further improved by its formulation in vegetable oil emulsion. These results have been of a great benefit to Dr. Hallett's research program.

The findings of Dr. Shabana's recent research at the University of Florida that involves the development of a novel, organic mulch-based delivery system for a biocontrol agent of purple and yellow nutsedges, two of the worst weeds affecting agricultural production in the U.S. and major part of the world, have a great chance of facilitating technology transfer and promotion of a small business enterprise through collaboration with the University of Florida.

Dr. Shabana's research in collaboration with the UK team of the University of Hertfordshire on the impacts of climate change on occurrence and distribution of the pathogenic seed-borne fungi of wheat and maize in Egypt is aiming to recommend short- to medium-term measures to deal the challenge to food security from threats of crop diseases and climate change and provide evidences for government to formulate long-term agricultural policies to mitigate and adapt field crop production so as to maintain national food security in the face of the rapidly growing population.

Dr. Shabana's research in collaboration with researchers from the College of Archeology, Damietta University and the UK team of the University of Bedfordshire on the green conservation of cultural heritage in Egypt is aiming to green-preserving cultural heritage, thus developing tourism industry, increasing national income, and developing stability and economy welfare in Egypt.
